In his work on constitutional theory, Amar has sought to develop a new framework for understanding the Constitution. He has argued that the Constitution is best understood as a set of "interpretive principles" that guide judges in their decisions. These principles include the principle of "original meaning," the principle of "structural coherence," and the principle of "democratic legitimacy." Amar has also argued that the Constitution is not a neutral document, but rather a document that embodies certain values, such as liberty, equality, and democracy.

In his work on the First Amendment, Amar has sought to defend the importance of free speech and religious freedom. He has argued that the First Amendment is essential to the maintenance of a free and democratic society.
