Gough's early work was influenced by the abstract expressionism of Jackson Pollock and Mark Rothko. However, he soon developed his own unique style, which combined abstract and figurative elements. Gough's paintings are often characterized by their bold brushwork, vibrant colors, and gestural energy.

In the 1960s, Gough began to incorporate landscape elements into his work. His landscapes are often lyrical and evocative, capturing the essence of the Irish countryside. Gough's landscapes are not simply representations of the physical world, but also expressions of his own emotions and experiences.

In addition to his landscapes, Gough also produced a number of portraits and figurative works. His portraits are often intimate and revealing, capturing the personalities and emotions of his subjects. Gough's figurative works are often characterized by their strong draftsmanship and expressive use of color.

Gough's work has been exhibited in galleries and museums around the world. He has also been the subject of numerous books and articles. Gough's work is represented in the collections of many major museums, including the National Gallery of Ireland, the Tate Gallery, and the Museum of Modern Art, New York.

Gough was a major figure in the Irish art world for over 50 years. He was a member of the Royal Hibernian Academy, and he served as President of the Irish Exhibition of Living Art. Gough was also a respected art critic and writer.

Gough died in 2021 at the age of 84. He is survived by his wife, artist Barbara Rae, and his two children.
